Go to the Compatibility tab and then change the target machine to windows 8.1. (Note that it will install the 32-bit version of Adobe Reader, if that is what you want. If you want a 64-bit version then use the next steps) Open up the command line and type 'notepad %systemroot%\system32\adobereader_9.3.4148.0.local.lnk' and then change the content of the file to point to the 64-bit version. Then close out of the cmd.exe prompt. Right click the setup file and hit properties again. Choose compatibility again and make sure windows 8.1 is selected. When asked if you want to have the executable run in compatability mode select yes. This will change the setup file's target machine to Windows 8.1. The setup file will still be in compatability mode, but it will be looking for the 64-bit version of Adobe Reader. It will default to the 32-bit version unless you change it. ic muscle potential and its role in excitation-contraction coupling. Further evidence for the involvement of SERCA in cardiac excitation-contraction coupling was provided by ^{45}Ca-uptake experiments. By incubating cardiomyocytes with ^{45}Ca, potential changes of the intracellular Ca^{2+} concentration can be measured. The present data demonstrate a significant decrease of ^{45}Ca-uptake during transjunctional depolarization, suggesting that SERCA is involved in the re-uptake of Ca^{2+} during contraction (Fig. 5{ref-type="fig"}). During depolarization, SERCA is assumed to mediate the re-uptake of Ca^{2+}. It is tempting to speculate that in the absence of functional SERCA this re-uptake is hampered, resulting in Ca^{2+} accumulation and inducing a prolongation of the contraction. During ECC, depolarization of the sarcolemma causes Ca^{2+} influx, which can be partly re-uptaken by SERCA, resulting in a delayed increase of the contraction. Decreased SERCA activity has been described in the experimental setting of different cardiomyopathies, like chronic or acute heart failure [@pone.0035474-Eckard 82157476af
